As of December 2019, the novel coronavirus, which causes severe acute respiratory syndrome coronavirus 2 (SARS-CoV-2), is a pandemic threat. As the spread of this virus remains an ongoing international health concern, global research to understand the pathogenesis of the novel virus is urgently needed. Evidence demonstrates that the virus can cause acute respiratory distress syndrome, leading to a high rate of fatality. Certain steps in the virus' infection cycle are presently being elucidated, including how the virus targets the lung epithelial cells and spreads to the cardiovascular system. Therefore, this study aims to investigate the link between the microRNA (miRNA) response triggered by SARS-CoV-2 and the development of lung diseases in patients. The study by Sun et al. evaluated two different mechanisms, represented by the miR-518c and miR-543 interaction with the caspase-1 gene and the interaction between the caspase-1 gene and the interleukin-1 β (IL-1 β) gene, through which SARS-CoV-2 may promote a pro-inflammatory response. In the study, the researchers identified the miRNAs (miR-518c and miR-543) by a reverse transcription quantitative polymerase chain reaction (RT-qPCR) analysis of the bronchoalveolar lavage fluid (BALF) samples of five patients. They performed cellular fractionation of the BALF samples to further analyze the effect of miR-518c and miR-543 on transfected or transduced A549 cells. In addition, the anti-viral effects of the synthetic antisense oligonucleotides against miR-518c and
